Student evaluation of teaching. At both Rutgers and USC, I worked to make student evaluations of teaching mandatory. Not that I overrate their merit, but rather I find them personally useful, and, as a manager I find them one useful source of consumer feedback. Our system of faculty evaluation at USC, which I helped to design, includes a peer review also. This involves a review of the course syllabi, the exams and papers/projects assigned, and classroom visitations to observe teaching first hand. In my own case, I have all courses graded by students after taking the final exam. On an A through F system, my courses routinely earn an A-/B+ average, and my personal performance as a teacher achieves a higher average. My social psychology courses is closed at 90-120 and my psychology of marriage human sexual behavior courses are routinely closed at a room full (130-150). For the last 20 years, I have been doing workshops and presentations in the community and to professional groups.
